ON THE NATURE OF

PREASTRES

The Thread of Preservation

Compiled by the Oraisayn Mythic Tapestry Division

Supplementary document to the Codex Threadica — Year 1003 A.F.

Sealed under Sartryx Authorization Level A

"It is not the loom that spins Preastres.
It is Preastres that allows looms to exist."

— Ancient Sartryx Doctrine, Seal of Myth 3:22

Abstract

Preastres is not a weaving thread, nor a combative one in the traditional arcane sense. It is not elemental, not spectral, not derived from material tradition. It is, instead, a cosmic scaffolding thread — designed not to create or destroy, but to anchor. It binds fate to continuity. It seals time into form.

It was not made for mortals. It was made for gods.

In the time before timekeeping, when the first Looms trembled with primal thought, it is written that Preastres was used to fasten reality itself to law, shape, and sequence. Where Chaos birthed infinite patterns, Preastres trimmed the fray. It is — and has always been — the boundary between what is and what is merely possible.

That a mortal now carries it is not unprecedented. It is, however, the most significant theological event in the Sartryx's recorded history. This document exists to ensure that those responsible for responding to that event understand precisely what they are dealing with.

I. Origin & Function

> "It is not the loom that spins Preastres.
> It is Preastres that allows looms to exist."
> — Ancient Sartryx Doctrine, Seal of Myth 3:22

Preastres is the Thread of Preservation. It holds more names than any other known force in the Tapestry:

- ✦ The Anchor Thread
- ✦ The Thread That Forbids Undoing
- ✦ The Law-Thread
- ✦ The Seam of the Divine Pattern

It was said to be woven into existence by the first deities to bind the gods themselves to oaths — a mechanism by which even divine will could be made accountable to consequence. Only select sovereigns, guardians, or world-shapers were ever entrusted with it. Not because it required exceptional power to wield, but because it required exceptional restraint. Preastres in the hands of someone who lacks restraint does not fail to work. It works completely. That is the danger.

Its fundamental capacity is the maintenance and protection of all threads — not merely fate, but ancestral line, magical truth, and the foundational weave of reality itself. It does not pick and choose. When fully active, it acts in accordance with the Loom's own design, which may or may not align with what the bearer intends.

Author's note ⌖: This is the crucial distinction the Threadbreaker misses.
He believes that bearing Preastres means commanding it.
But Preastres does not serve. It anchors. The bearer is not its wielder.
The bearer is its vessel — the point in the Tapestry where the Loom's will finds a living thread stable enough to pass through.

II. Abilities of Preastres

The following five capacities are documented across bearer records and Oraisayn historical logs. They are listed in order of accessibility — from what even an untrained bearer may manifest unconsciously, to what has been observed only once in mortal history.

1. Thread Lock

Preastres can freeze any thread — person, object, or law of magic — mid-weave. The effect suspends the thread in its current state, preventing change, decay, or development until the lock is released or the bearer's will dissipates.

Inexperienced bearers manifest this instinctively — events pause around them during emotional extremity, magic stills in their vicinity, or a threat that should have connected simply... does not.

Masters can use Thread Lock with precision: selecting which threads to freeze while leaving others in motion. At full expression, a bearer can lock reality in place within a defined boundary.

> "One bearer once stopped a war —
> not with diplomacy,
> but by halting the thread of battle itself."

2. Stabilization & Reinforcement

Dying threads, fraying lives, ruptured legacies — Preastres can reinforce these by re-braiding their structural pattern. The process does not heal in the conventional sense. It does not replace what has been lost. It identifies the original weave pattern of the damaged thread and restores it to structural integrity, the way a skilled mender reinforces fabric rather than replacing it.

This is not a resurrection ability. Preastres cannot mend what never was — only what once was possible. A thread that was always going to fray cannot be permanently stabilized, only temporarily reinforced. The Loom's design takes precedence.

3. Oathbinding

Preastres can be used to create a Threadbound oath — an agreement woven directly into the fate of all parties, unbreakable by conventional means. The oath does not compel action; it makes the consequences of breaking it as structurally certain as any other law of the Tapestry.

Ancient gods used Oathbinding to force loyalty among pantheons and instate fate-laws governing entire peoples. The records are clear on one point: even gods feared breaking them. Not because of what would happen to them, but because of what a broken Threadbound oath does to the fabric of reality around the breach.

4. Temporal Pattern Hold — Advanced

This capacity is frequently misunderstood as time travel. It is not. Temporal Pattern Hold allows the bearer to suspend the temporal decay of fate — to freeze the consequences of an event in metaphysical stasis, preventing them from propagating through the Tapestry, without reversing or altering the event itself.

The distinction matters enormously. A battle that has been Thread Locked has not un-happened. A death that has been placed in Temporal Pattern Hold has not been undone. The consequence has been held — suspended — while the bearer determines what to do next. This state cannot be maintained indefinitely. When it breaks, everything that was suspended propagates at once.

Caution: Used improperly, Temporal Pattern Hold can collapse weaker patterns in the vicinity as the suspended consequence compresses surrounding threads. The more significant the suspended event, the larger the collapse radius when released.

5. Echo Preservation — Rare

Echo Preservation maintains the memory-threads of individuals who have been erased from fate — people whose threads have been severed, unmade, or overwritten so completely that the Tapestry no longer records their existence. Only Preastres can hold these echoes with integrity. Without it, the memory simply dissolves.

Used only once in recorded mortal history.
By Prince Phoibus of Clothos.

He preserved the memory-thread of the woman he rewrote fate to save — ensuring that even if the Tapestry refused to record what he had done, the echo of her original fate would survive.

Whether this was mercy or documentation is still debated.

Author's note ◈: Echo Preservation is the ability the Threadbreaker is most likely to understand. He watched someone he loved become erased — not by violence, but by the quiet unraveling of a bearer left alone. The Tapestry does not hold records of people who come undone that way. They simply stop being there. He would know exactly what was lost. He would know exactly why Phoibus did this. He would not find it comforting.

III. Dangers & Limitations

"Though Preastres is classified as supreme,
it is not limitless within a mortal body.
Fate is fragile. Preastres respects this.
To meddle without understanding is to fray
the foundation of reality itself."

Every documented mortal bearer has encountered the following limitations. They are not defects in Preastres — they are the Loom's built-in acknowledgment that no mortal body was originally designed to channel it.

Burden of Usage: The bearer is subjected to severe physiological toll — nosebleeds, fainting, mental backlash proportional to the application's intensity. Minor Thread Locks may produce nothing more than a headache. Oathbinding at scale has incapacitated bearers for days. Temporal Pattern Hold at full expression has left bearers with permanent sensory damage.

Emotional Interference: Preastres reacts best to clarity and purpose. Emotional distortion or fear may misdirect the anchor — causing it to attach to the wrong thread, stabilize the wrong pattern, or Lock a thread the bearer did not intend to freeze. In states of grief or panic, involuntary Thread Locks have been documented affecting everyone in proximity to the bearer.

The Creativity Paradox: While most users wield Preastres conservatively — as a preservation tool, as intended — a creative and sufficiently determined bearer may breach its latent restrictions. Such users do not protect order. They weaponize it. When used this way, Preastres ceases to be a safeguard and becomes a divine enforcement mechanism: not preserving what is, but mandating what must be.

"Phoibus is the only mortal known to reach this level — when he rethreaded another's fate onto a different body.
The act was irreversible.
And unforgettable."

Author's note ◈: The Creativity Paradox is what separates Phoibus from every other mortal bearer on record. He did not use Preastres to preserve. He used it to rewrite. The distinction is the difference between a surgeon and someone who decides to redesign the patient.

Future Anteros — the Threadbreaker — attempted a version of the same thing. But he lacked Preastres entirely. He used a corrupted fragment of it, secondhand, to rip through time rather than rethread a fate within it.

The result was not a rewrite. It was a wound.

IV. Full Potential

"Only in rare epochs — when fate is in mortal peril — does Preastres awaken completely."

At full awakening, Preastres operates beyond the bearer's conscious direction. It acts in accordance with the Loom's own priorities, using the bearer as a vessel rather than a tool. The bearer does not command at this stage — they endure, and transmit, and try not to break under the weight of what passes through them.

At this stage, documented capacities include:

- ✦ Seal or destroy world-threads to halt apocalyptic-scale unraveling of the Tapestry. The bearer does not choose which threads. The Loom does.
- ✦ Create permanent thread-bound realms including stasis loops and prison realities — spaces where specific threads are held in unchanging isolation indefinitely.

- ✦ Act against other fate-deities autonomously should fate be tampered with maliciously. At full awakening, Preastres does not require the bearer's permission to respond to a threat. It responds through them.

> "Legends claim that in such a state,
> the bearer may be mistaken for a god —
> not because of appearance,
> but because reality obeys them."

> Author's note ⌖: Seraphina Moon's awakening is described in Oraisayn records as triggered under uncertain emotional and magical circumstances.
> The Thread Fracture at the Weaveflight Arena — the Threadbreaker's attack — is the most likely candidate for what the Loom interpreted as "fate being tampered with maliciously."
>
> If so: Preastres did not awaken in Seraphina because she summoned it.
> It awakened because someone was trying to take it from her.
> The Loom responded. Through her.
> She was not chosen because she was ready.
> She was chosen because she was already there.

V. Known Mortal Bearers

The following historical bearers are documented in the Oraisayn's sealed archives. The full list spans 108 known mortals across the history of Fatum, most of them figures of such antiquity that their records exist only as fragments. The three entries below represent the most complete documentation available.

Historical Bearers

Elara Vynth, known as the Silent Queen

Sealed the Sea of Screaming Threads — a catastrophic unraveling event in the ancient era in which a significant portion of the Tapestry's oceanic fate-threads began actively resisting the Loom's design. The sealing required full awakening. Elara Vynth did not speak again afterward. The Oraisayn records do not explain why. The Sea has been quiet since.

Phoibus of Clothos, known as the Fallen Spinner — the 108th bearer

Rewrote another's fate to save a girl — the only documented use of Preastres's Creativity Paradox at mortal level. The act was unprecedented in Sartryx history: not a preservation, not a stabilization, but a fundamental rethreading of a living person's fate onto a different outcome. It worked. He was stripped of the thread and his title afterward. The Tapestry accommodated what he did. The Loom did not forgive it.

Present Bearer

Oraisayn Record — Year 1003 A.F.

Present Bearer: Seraphina Moon

Status: Active.

Thread Awakening triggered under uncertain emotional and magical circumstances.

Potential: Unknown.

Psychological compatibility: Classified.

Recommendation: Observation, not interference.

Author's note ◈: 'Observation, not interference' is the Oraisayn doing what institutions do when they encounter something they cannot classify: they watch it and wait for someone else to act first.

Seraphina Moon does not know this record exists.
She does not know she has been assessed for psychological compatibility with a thread that has killed or unmade every bearer who used it beyond design.

She is going to find out.

Final Annotation

Penned in the margins by Archivist Yuun, Year 1003 A.F.

— Archivist Yuun, personal annotation

"We feared what Preastres could do in the hands of gods.
But I fear it more in the hands of a mortal clever enough to ask:
what if I don't preserve the world —
what if I rewrite the laws that bind it?"

Archivist Yuun's annotation was not submitted for official inclusion. It was found written in the physical margins of the sealed document when the archive was last accessed. No date is confirmed. The handwriting matches Yuun's documented script from Year 1003 A.F. — which means it was written during or after Seraphina Moon's awakening was recorded.

The Oraisayn has not issued a formal response to this annotation. It has not been removed.

✦ ——— ✦

End of Document — Sartryx Authorization Level A