VAIN, VALIANT, AND VERY MUCH IN LOVE

World & Lore Compendium

Incorporating the Codex Threadica, Year 1003 A.F.

Author's Reference Document — Draft 2

"He is her undoing. And her undoing is what made him."

"Magic is no longer a birthright. It is a discipline."

"When fate is in peril, the Sun shall rise again." — Clothos Prophecy

What's in this document

This compendium incorporates both the author's design notes and the in-world Codex Threadica (Year 1003 A.F.) to create a single reference for writing VVVMI. Sections marked with a ✦ symbol draw directly from the Codex. Sections marked with a ◈ symbol are author's expanded notes and narrative intent.

✦ Section I — The World of Fatum: Setting & Calendar

- Section II — The Four Houses of the Sartryx
- Section III — The Threadic Disciplines
- Section IV — Birth Threads
- Section V — Preastres: Full Lore & Bearer History
- Section VI — Warmth: Daphni's Legacy
- Section VII — The Threadbreaker: Mechanics & Deterioration
- Section VIII — The Phoibus-Daphni Parallel & Thematic Function
- Section IX — Weaveflight & The Sartryx
- Section X — The Kaabaig

I. The World of Fatum

> "In the modern Sartryx, the Tapestry of Fate remains sacred,
> but magic has evolved beyond its noble origins."
> — High Archivist Elan Tress, Aurelya Hall

Fatum is a world built on thread. Not metaphorically — literally. The physical and metaphysical architecture of Fatum is woven: fate is a tapestry maintained by the Loom, history is recorded in silver-scribed documents, and the dominant form of magic is the manipulation of fate-threads made visible and tangible. The world's geography includes at minimum the regions of Clothos (noble, gold-laced, weavers of destiny and cloth alike), Iluyto (fire-tempered, historically prejudiced against, home of Warmth magic), and Kaia (the ancient forest homeland of the Kaabaig).

The calendar in use during VVVMI is A.F. — After Fatum — suggesting a founding event significant enough to reset the count of years. The Sartryx operates in Year 1003 A.F. The events of the Phoibus-Daphni prequel are set in the ancient era, well before this calendar's reckoning.

The Tapestry of Fate

The Tapestry is the underlying metaphysical structure of Fatum — the pattern into which all Birth Threads are woven, and from which all fate derives. It is maintained by the Loom: an entity or mechanism older than recorded history that the Codex treats as simultaneously divine and mechanical. When the Tapestry frays, the consequences are not simply magical — they are ontological. Reality becomes unstable. Thread Fractures appear. The wrong versions of people start bleeding through from timelines that were never meant to be.

The Oraisayn — the governing authority of the Sartryx — derives its legitimacy in part from its role as custodian of the Tapestry's records. The silver-scribed archives it holds contain documentation of every known thread anomaly, bearer event, and Codex entry since the founding.

II. The Four Houses of the Sartryx

> "House placement is not based on magic type, but on threadic potential:
> the way a student is most likely to influence fate."
> — Codex Threadica, Section II

The Sartryx's four houses are not sorted by personality or skill. They are sorted by how a student's thread interacts with fate — the manner in which they are most likely to leave a mark on the Tapestry. A courageous person might still be placed in Aurelya if their thread calls for subtle influence over direct action. The houses reflect potential fate, not character.

House	Symbol	Domain	Known Traits

Aurelya	Mirror & Moon	Reflection, Judgement, Strategy	Sharp, aloof, brilliant under pressure
Illustra	Flame & Loom	Action, Courage, Command	Tactical, outspoken, emotionally charged
Velquinn	Veil & Feather	Curiosity, Lore, Adaptation	Cunning, observant, chaotic-neutral
Therenynox	Scale & Vine	Order, Wisdom, Balance	Dutiful, serene, future-leaders

Narrative Notes on Each House ◈

AURELYA

Seraphina Moon's house. Mirror & Moon is an almost too-perfect assignment for the girl whose thread burns gold with fate's own seal. Aurelya's domain of reflection and judgement maps onto Seraphina's nature precisely — she is not a person who acts first; she observes, reads the room, and responds with devastating accuracy. Three-time former Weaveflight champion before Illustra's current dynasty. This history of past excellence that has since been eclipsed is not incidental to Seraphina's arc.

ILLUSTRA

Anteros Magnus and Tirian Kallan's house. Flame & Loom — action and courage, emotionally charged. The Loom half of that pairing is interesting: Illustra is not merely a house of fighters, but of those who act in ways that shape the weave directly. Three consecutive Weaveflight champions. The house's current dynasty rests substantially on Anteros and Tirian, which means their personal dynamic is also a structural load-bearing wall.

VELQUINN

Reve Sagan's house. Veil & Feather suits him — chaotic-neutral, curious, adapts to whoever he's standing next to. Velquinn's underground alliances with whoever is currently losing to Illustra are described as ancient. They have not worked yet. This has not stopped them. Reve's theatrical suffering over thirty pearls is, in this context, a proud house tradition.

THERENYNOX

Present on Weaveflight rosters but not yet a significant narrative presence. Scale & Vine suggests a house of future administrators, mediators, and quiet powers. Available for development as the plot requires; their temperament of dutiful serenity may make them useful as a counterpoint when Aurelya and Illustra are tearing pieces off each other.

III. The Threadic Disciplines

> "Rather than being elemental, most modern abilities are Threadic Disciplines — resonances categorized by thread type."
> — Codex Threadica, Section III

All students at the Sartryx manifest one dominant Threadic Discipline — the primary mode through which their Birth Thread interacts with the Tapestry. Disciplines are not chosen; they emerge from the soul's weave. A student cannot train themselves into a different discipline, but they can develop secondary resonances across disciplines with dedicated study.

Disciplines are categorized by tier: Core Disciplines are common and teachable; Legacy Disciplines are rare and partially lost; Mythic Disciplines exist outside the standard curriculum entirely.

The Discipline Tiers ✦

Discipline	Core Power	Notes
Binding	Anchor / Stabilize	Stabilizes, locks, or stalls fate. Defensive. Common in guardians and law enforcement.
Weaving	Patterning	Creates illusions, enchantments, strategy-based fatecraft.
Unraveling	Decay / Entropy	Memory erasure, thread-breaking. Rarely healing. Dangerous and uncommon.
Augmenting	Amplify	Enhances existing fate threads — used in duels and support roles. Taught at the Sartryx.
Divining	Sight	Perceives threadlines and futures. Rare. Dangerous.
Burning (Warmth)	Transform / Ignite	LEGACY. Destroys or transforms fate. Volatile. See Section VI.
Guarding (Preastres)	Seal / Preserve	MYTHIC. Preserves and protects fate. Preastres-class only. See Section V.

Narrative Notes on Disciplines ◈

Anteros's primary discipline, given his Warden role in Weaveflight, is most consistent with Binding — anchoring, holding the line, defensive warding. This aligns with his Birth Thread reading (guardianship, the one who holds the line) and his instinct to step in front of things rather than around them.

Seraphina's crescent arc — the unsyllabused curved thread bolt she produced in the duel — sits at the junction of Augmenting and something older. Professor Callaghn's reaction (a single rationed clap, and the declaration that it was not in any syllabus) signals that what Seraphina produced was not a refined version of taught technique but an involuntary expression of the Guarding discipline bleeding through from Preastres. She did not learn it. The Loom moved through her.

Tirian Kallan's Binder role in Weaveflight names her discipline directly. Her thread is pink — warmth, momentum, the familiar. In a story about threads that pull people toward dangerous fates, Tirian is the thread that represents the safe choice. That she is also genuinely excellent, genuinely warm, and genuinely in love with Anteros is what makes her role as the unchosen path so painful rather than merely convenient.

IV. Birth Threads

> "One does not choose one's Birth Thread.
> It is whispered into the soul by the Loom itself."
> — Old Weavers' Prayer

A Birth Thread is not a power. It is a symbol of a soul's destined path — the Loom's statement about who this person is at their most essential. Birth Threads function somewhat like constellations in astrology or cards in divination: they name a tendency, a potential, a shape of fate, rather than a fixed outcome. Some threads awaken during trauma. Some change at death. Some, like Daphni of Iluyto's, evolve mid-life in ways that confound scholars.

Known Birth Threads ✦

Thread Name	Meaning	Notable Bearers
Vici	"I shall conquer"	Common in leaders. Often tragic.
Renuvamen	"To begin again"	Daphni of Iluyto — only bearer on record. Her thread evolved mid-life.
Austrix	"The unbending"	Common in Illustra. Suggests rigidity that reads as strength until it doesn't.
Velora	"One who veils"	Favored in Velquinn and espionage lines.
Seressa	"Of gentle sorrow"	Often found in pacifists and healers.
Calerion	"Sun-born"	Royal Clothos line. Phoibus bore this thread.
Monalthein	"Watcher of the Moon"	Possibly Seraphina Moon. Unconfirmed as of Year 1003 A.F.
Ossanel	"To fall and rise"	Symbol of transformation. Associated with those who survive their own undoing.

Narrative Notes on Birth Threads ◈

ANTEROS MAGNUS — AXIOMAE

Axiomae is the name of Anteros's Birth Thread — not a thread name from the Codex index, but a personal name, which is significant. Personalized thread names suggest a thread that has developed enough complexity and resonance to earn individual designation. Axiomae manifests as blue. Given the Codex's association of Illustra with flame and loom, Anteros's blue sits in interesting tension with his house — he is the guardian in the house of action, the one who holds the line while others charge forward.

When the Threadbreaker uses Axiomae against present Anteros, he is weaponizing the name of the thread against its own bearer. This is not merely a physical injury. It is the Loom's notation of self-betrayal.

SERAPHINA MOON — MONALTHEIN, UNCONFIRMED

The Codex lists Monalthein (Watcher of the Moon) as possibly Seraphina's thread, unconfirmed. This unconfirmed status is itself meaningful: the Codex cannot fully read her thread because Preastres is threading itself through it, obscuring the original designation beneath the Loom's own gold. What we know for certain is that her thread manifests as blue-gold — her own nature layered with the covenant she accepted without knowing.

The name Monalthein also resonates against the story's central tension. She watches. She observes with devastating accuracy. She does not yet understand that she has been watched in return — by the Threadbreaker, across time, with an intensity that borders on grief.

DAPHNI OF ILUYTO — RENUVAMEN

To begin again is the most quietly devastating thread name in the Codex. Daphni died. Phoibus rewrote her death. She began again. Her thread's evolution mid-life — unprecedented in the scholarly record — is likely the mechanism by which Preastres responded to Phoibus's rewrite: the Loom accommodated the impossible by changing the thread itself rather than breaking it. The consequences of this accommodation are still rippling forward a thousand years later.

V. Preastres — Full Lore & Bearer History

> "When fate is in peril, the Sun shall rise again."
> — Clothos Prophecy
>
> "The first bearer was divine. Phoibus was the 108th.
> A thousand years passed without a successor. Until Seraphina Moon."
> — Codex Threadica, Section V

What Preastres Is

Preastres is not a Threadic Discipline in the standard sense. It is a legacy magic — the Loom's own thread, occasionally extending itself into a living bearer when the Tapestry is near collapse. The Codex classifies it under Guarding: Seal / Preserve. The first bearer was divine. By the time of Phoibus (the 108th bearer), it had become something that could inhabit a mortal, though at significant cost. The gap between Phoibus and Seraphina spans a thousand years and the entire Age of Eclipse.

Preastres is not a power. It is a weight. The bearer's thread becomes partially occupied by the Loom's repair work — they feel the Tapestry's distress directly, as if the fraying were happening inside them. Left unwitnessed and unsupported, this will eventually consume the bearer from the inside. Not dramatically. Quietly. The way a seam unravels when no one notices the first loose thread.

How a Bearer Is Chosen

The Loom does not select by bloodline, talent, or noble standing. The Codex is explicit: Seraphina Moon is not of royal blood, not thread-compatible by any standard metric, and her awakening has caused a theological and magical crisis within the Sartryx. Some interpret her selection as proof the Tapestry is so badly damaged it is accepting any viable anchor. Others argue the Loom is evolving — selecting by a criterion no scholar has yet successfully named.

The author's interpretation: the Loom selects by endurance. Not strength. Not power. The capacity to continue bearing impossible weight without breaking. Seraphina Moon, who has performed composure under the weight of being perfect her entire life while no one asked if she was alright, is the most enduring person in the story. The Loom did not pick someone powerful. It picked someone already practiced at surviving.

The Gold in Seraphina's Thread

The gold threading into her Birth Thread is not foreign power bleeding in from outside. It is the Loom's covenant color, threading itself through her because she is now its anchor. The blue beneath — her own thread — does not disappear. It persists. The blue-gold together is the visual representation of a person whose identity is holding the fate of the world steady while still being, underneath it all, just herself.

This is also why the Threadbreaker's attempt to extract Preastres is incoherent: Preastres cannot be separated from the bearer without destroying them. It is threaded through, not attached on top. Future Anteros either does not know this, has forgotten it, or has stopped distinguishing between the two.

Bearer History ✦

THE DIVINE BEARERS — PRE-HISTORY

The Codex notes that the first bearer was divine. No further documentation exists within accessible archives. The implication is that Preastres was originally not meant for mortal bodies at all — its presence in human bearers is already a compromise, an accommodation the Loom made at some point in the deep past when purely divine maintenance was no longer sufficient.

PHOIBUS, THE 108TH BEARER — ANCIENT ERA

Third son of the King of Clothos. Birth Thread: Calerion (Sun-born). Called the Spinner of All Threads — a title acknowledging what Preastres permits its bearer: not control over fate, but an awareness of all threads' connections that no ordinary Weaver can access. Phoibus bore Preastres; Phoibus loved Daphni of Iluyto; Daphni died. Phoibus used Preastres to rewrite her death. The Loom accommodated it — Daphni's thread evolved into Renuvamen and she lived. But the act of using Preastres as a tool of personal will rather than a vessel for the Loom's repair was a violation of the covenant. Phoibus was stripped of title and standing. The thread left him. He became the Fallen Spinner.

> ◈ Author's note: The fact that Phoibus's rewrite worked — that the Loom accommodated it — is important.
> Preastres cannot easily be weaponized against the Loom's design. But love, apparently, is the exception > the Loom has never fully resolved. Phoibus got Daphni back. He lost everything else.
> Future Anteros will learn this story and believe it means a rewrite is possible.
> He will not fully reckon with the second half of the lesson until it is too late.

THE GAP — ONE THOUSAND YEARS

Between Phoibus and Seraphina, Preastres manifested in no documented bearer. The Age of Eclipse — in which the Oraisayn turned upside down and the Loom of Fate burned itself to ash, per the textbook Anteros half-remembers from Codex class — falls within this gap. Whether this is cause or effect is not established in the Codex. What matters for the story: Seraphina has no living predecessor. No guide. The only history of her situation is a cautionary tale about a prince who became monstrous trying to save someone he loved.

She does not yet know this history. Anteros will eventually learn it. The Threadbreaker already knows it — and it is part of why he is so desperate. He knows exactly what happens to Preastres bearers when they are left alone.

SERAPHINA MOON, BEARER UNKNOWN — YEAR 1003 A.F.

Not of royal blood. Not thread-compatible by standard metrics. Aurelya-housed, silver-haired, and currently managing a Weaveflight tournament while fate threads itself into her without her consent. The gold in her thread is new enough that the Codex can only say unconfirmed next to her name. The theological and magical crisis her awakening has created is real — but it is happening in conference rooms and archives, while she is standing on a manager's tier with a clipboard, not knowing the Loom has claimed her.

The story's resolution is not that Preastres is removed or defeated. It is that Seraphina is no longer alone in bearing it — and therefore does not unravel. Present Anteros does not save her by fighting the Threadbreaker. He saves her by finally seeing her.

VI. Warmth — Daphni's Legacy

> "Originally feared for its power to burn through fate,
> Warmth was misunderstood as destructive.
> In truth, its earliest bearer — Daphni of Iluyto — > demonstrated that Warmth could create new threads from ash."
> — Codex Threadica, Section VI

Warmth is the oldest of the Legacy Disciplines and the most misunderstood. In its original form — True Warmth — it was not a weapon or a tool of destruction. It was the capacity to burn through fate that had become fixed, calcified, or wrongly woven, and replace it with something living. Creation through destruction. New threads from ash.

Daphni of Iluyto was its first documented bearer and its defining practitioner. The prejudice against Iluyto in Fatum's history is rooted in fear of Warmth — fire magic that can burn through destiny itself is terrifying to a civilization built on the belief that fate is sacred and immutable. Daphni's existence, and what she demonstrated Warmth could do, is the reason that prejudice has since lessened. She proved that the discipline was not simply volatile destruction. She proved it could make.

Warmth Today

Modern Warmth — now folded into the broader Burning Discipline — has lost most of its original depth. It is practiced primarily by Illuytris and taught as a tool of focused ignition. The emotional and divine dimension Daphni embodied has been classified out of it. Scholars treat it as a physical skill, not a fate-altering one.

True Warmth has not been seen since Daphni. Whether this is because the Loom no longer requires it, because no bearer with the right thread has appeared, or because the Sartryx's classification system has made it unrecognizable when it does appear — the Codex does not say.

Warmth's Function in the Larger Story ◈

Daphni's Warmth and Seraphina's Preastres are not the same magic — but they rhyme. Both are forms of fate-alteration the Sartryx finds difficult to categorize. Both manifest in women the establishment initially dismissed. Both are older than the disciplines built to contain them.

The Iluyto blood in Seraphina's family rumor — her mother said to have come from Iluyto — is worth noting here. Even if it is not a direct narrative thread, it positions Seraphina at the intersection of two histories the world of Fatum is still sorting out: the legacy of Preastres and the legacy of Warmth. She carries both silences in her bloodline. Neither of them is hers yet. The story is about the moment she claims them.

VII. The Threadbreaker

Codename: The Threadbreaker
Real Identity: Future Anteros Magnus
"He carries too many threads in one soul. That's not natural."
— A Kaabaig Elder

"His strikes never touch Seraphina Moon."
— Observed by Tirian Kallan, unspoken

Origin

In a future where Seraphina Moon unravels under the weight of Preastres — quietly, without anyone noticing until it is too late — Anteros Magnus breaks. He gives up everything to go back. But time is not a thread. It cannot be rewoven. So he does not travel through it. He rips through it. He threads himself into a past that was never meant to hold him: masked, unstable, barely coherent, carrying a corrupted fragment of Preastres that clings to him like grief refusing to let go.

He does not have a plan. He has a destination and a refusal.

The Physics of His Existence

Because he ripped rather than wove his way into the present, the Threadbreaker exists as a structural impossibility. The Loom has no thread for him here — his slot is occupied by present Anteros. He borrows threads to maintain form: fraying ones, corrupted ones, strands shed from dying spools and broken looms. He is not a person so much as a person-shaped accumulation of borrowed stability.

The monsters that pour through Thread Fractures when he appears are not creatures he controls. They are the holes his existence tears in the Tapestry, given shape by ambient fear and corrupted fate-threads. He is not summoning them. He is leaking them. Thread Fractures are not his weapon. They are his symptom.

Deterioration Arc

The Threadbreaker's hold on form is inversely proportional to the health of the present timeline. As Anteros and Seraphina's threads draw closer — as resonance strengthens, as genuine softness accumulates — the future that produced him becomes less inevitable. And therefore he becomes less real.

Story Stage	State	Observable Signs
Early chapters	Sharp, precise, terrifying	Mask fits perfectly. Voice controlled. Strikes surgical. Monsters coordinated.
Mid-story	Slipping	Mask sits wrong. Voice drops into Anteros's cadences. Monsters less controlled. He hesitates when she looks at him.
Late story	Echo more than man	Barely a separate person. Quotes things Seraphina only whispered once. Cannot maintain the mask. His attacks stop mid-motion when she is near.

Relationship to Present Characters

TO PRESENT ANTEROS

Cruel. Unforgiving. He snarls: "You let her bear it alone. You always let her bear it alone." He is not trying to warn present Anteros. He is furious, and his fury is the specific kind that only comes from recognizing your own failures in someone else's face. When Axiomae hesitates in recognition during their confrontation, it is the thread recognizing itself across time.

TO SERAPHINA

He cannot harm her. This is not mercy or strategy — it is compulsion. His attacks swerve at the last moment. His monsters avoid her quadrant. Once, she almost touches his mask and he flinches like he has been burned. When he speaks to her, his voice slips: quiet, familiar, like some version of him still believes she might recognize him. He calls her Preastres with the reverence of someone who has said that word a thousand times in a room where she was already gone.

The Unmasking

The Threadbreaker removes the mask himself. This is a conscious choice — not defeat, not surrender. By this point he is barely a separate person. He is the last echo of a future being unmade moment by moment by the love story he came to protect.

He removes the mask. Present Anteros sees his own face. The Threadbreaker says something small — not a speech. Something that sounds less like a villain's final words and more like a man setting something down that was too heavy to carry.

Then he is gone. Not in an explosion. Like a thread pulled gently from a weave when it is no longer needed. The sky does not mark it. The Fractures stop appearing. Somewhere in the future, a version of Anteros Magnus does not break — because the story he came from no longer exists.

VIII. The Phoibus-Daphni Parallel

The tragedy rhymes.
Two men. Two deaths they could not accept.
Two rewrites. Both became Fallen.

"Phoibus was the Fallen Spinner.
Future Anteros is the Threadbreaker.
The mechanism differs. The shape of the grief is identical."

The Structural Mirror

Phoibus & Daphni	Future Anteros & Seraphina
Phoibus bore Preastres.	Future Anteros witnessed a Preastres bearer unravel.
Daphni died.	Seraphina unraveled — a death in slow motion.
Phoibus used Preastres to rewrite her death.	Future Anteros used a corrupted Preastres fragment to rip through time.
The Loom accommodated the rewrite. Daphni lived.	The present timeline is being changed. The outcome is not yet certain.
Phoibus became the Fallen Spinner. Stripped. Alone.	Future Anteros became the Threadbreaker. Barely coherent. Alone.
Phoibus got Daphni back and lost everything else.	Future Anteros came back for Seraphina and may lose himself entirely.

What the Parallel Means Thematically ◈

VVVMI is, at its core, a story about the difference between loving someone and trying to control their fate. Phoibus and future Anteros both loved fiercely and completely. They are not condemned for loving. They are undone by the specific form their love took in the face of loss: the refusal to allow the person they loved to be mortal, vulnerable, or beyond their reach.

Present Anteros gets a different ending not because he loves Seraphina less, but because he learns — slowly, reluctantly, through every cold interaction and charged silence — that the right way to love her is not to protect her from Preastres, but to stand beside her while she bears it. To see that her composure is a form of asking. To answer.

The story does not argue against love. It argues against love as possession. Against love as the belief that if you find the right thread to pull, you can keep someone from becoming what they are meant to be.

Daphni's Legacy in the World

Daphni of Iluyto was a pioneer — the reason Iluyto prejudice diminished in Fatum's history. Her thread name, Renuvamen (To begin again), is the story of what she was: the first demonstration that Warmth was not simply destruction, and that an Illuytri woman was not simply to be dismissed. The ground she broke centuries before VVVMI made it possible for someone to be Seraphina Moon — not entirely accepted, but not destroyed either.

Seraphina does not know this history. The reader can. And the reader can notice that Seraphina's unnamed Iluyto blood — whispered as rumor about her mother's origins — places her in the very lineage Daphni fought to make livable.

IX. Weaveflight & The Sartryx

> "The Weaveflight Arena had been conjured from threads > older than the Sartryx itself —
> woven from high Threadica and higher ego."

The Sartryx

The Sartryx is the preeminent academic institution of Fatum — part school, part court, part arena. It is where the children of the realm's great houses come to be educated in Weave, history, politics, and the art of being seen correctly. The Oraisayn governs it with the authority of ancient decree: seating arrangements, house rosters, Weaveflight qualifiers, and the silver-scribed records of every thread anomaly ever documented are all administered here.

The Sartryx's formal curriculum includes Thread Theory, Tactical Weaveflight, Resonance Control, and Mythic Tapestry Studies. The most gifted students are watched for Thread Awakening (latent power flare), Anomaly Resonance (unusual harmonics), and Corruption by Shears (unraveling of the soul-thread). Seraphina Moon currently qualifies for all three categories, though the Oraisayn's records on her case are sealed under Authorization Level A.

Weaveflight

Weaveflight is the Sartryx's signature tournament — part athletic event, part Threadica exhibition, all spectacle. The arena is conjured from ancient thread-work, floating on axes that do not entirely obey gravity. At its center hangs the Loom Thread — the prize — and the Stray Thread is the mobile element that must be caught to claim it.

WEAVEFLIGHT POSITIONS

Position	Function & VVVMI Holder
Warden	Defensive anchor. Barriers, interception, warding. Anteros Magnus (Illustra Captain). Luan Cahir (Aurelya Warden).
Binder	Offensive-creative. Complex thread constructions, binding opponent movement. Tirian Kallan (Illustra). Kothan Felix (Aurelya).
Unraveler	Counter-specialist. Dismantling opponent strategies and thread constructions. Jane Lawrence (Illustra). Mika Ella (Aurelya).

Tail Weavers	Pursuit and Stray Thread chase. Most physically demanding role. Xoie Troba & Shayne Limerence (Illustra). Osyth & Eiran Anore (Aurelya).
Manager	Non-flying strategy role. Timeout calls, formation adjustments, real-time reads. Seraphina Moon (Aurelya). Does not fly. Controls the sky anyway.

Narrative Notes ◈

The tournament structure places Seraphina on an elevated manager's tier — she cannot fly, but she directs everyone who can. This is the story showing the reader who she is before the Fracture strips her mask off: someone who controls the sky without being in it. Her whispered timeout call that somehow shifts the entire score is not luck or charm. It is Preastres-adjacent strategic sight, functioning as Divining without being named as such. She does not know this is what it is.

The Threadbreaker targets her anyway, from this position of apparent safety. The Thread Fracture opens beneath the manager's tier specifically because the Loom has marked her. Where she stands, fate is thinner.

Professor Callaghn

Professor Callaghn teaches both History and Augmenting, somehow always arranges for Anteros to be seated beside Seraphina, walks with a cane that taps warnings, and applauded Seraphina's unsyllabused crescent arc with exactly one clap. He knew precisely what he saw. Whether his repeated pairing of these two students is intuition, intervention, or something more prescient is a narrative choice held deliberately open. He is not accidental.

X. The Kaabaig

> "Kaabaigs are now rare, revered, and partially forgotten.
> Their sensitivity to thread shifts and emotional resonance > marks them as living instruments of the Loom."
> — Codex Threadica, Section VIII

Kaabaig are ancient beings — or ancient-blooded people — whose magic does not align easily with the Sartryx's classification system. Once crucial to fate-weaving, their practice is passed through lineage or sacred bonding rites rather than academic study, and most now reside in Kaia. The Codex treats them with a mixture of reverence and taxonomic frustration: their hybrid of Binding and Divining is documented but not fully understood.

Their defining characteristic is sensitivity to thread shifts and emotional resonance — they feel the state of the Tapestry the way a musician feels a chord going wrong. When the Kaabaig elder murmurs that the Threadbreaker carries too many threads in one soul, it is not a metaphor. He is reading something real: the structural impossibility of a man whose Birth Thread exists twice in the same timeline.

Minnie Dimitri ✦

The Codex describes Minnie Dimitri as a currently bonded Kaabaig viewed as both a comedic failure and a mythic anomaly. Scholars debate whether his presence signals the return of a forgotten age or the last gasp of it. Within VVVMI, this framing is an opportunity: a character who is simultaneously ridiculous and genuinely significant, whose presence at the Sartryx is unexplained and whose sensitivity to thread anomalies makes him an inadvertent witness to things no one else can perceive. His function in the story is available for development.

Kaabaig Blood in Seraphina's Lineage ◈

Whispers persist that Seraphina's mother came from Iluyto, and that somewhere in her maternal line runs Kaabaig blood — a suggestion treated in Clothos circles as heresy stitched in silk. The Codex notes that Kaabaig sensitivity is passed through lineage. If those whispers are true, it adds a third layer to Seraphina's inheritance: the Preastres covenant threading itself through her, the potential Warmth legacy of Iluyto in her blood, and the Loom-sensing capacity of the Kaabaig beneath both of them.

This would explain, without requiring explicit magical justification, why the Loom selected her. She is not chosen despite being unexpected. She is chosen because she is the convergence point of three lineages the Sartryx has always kept separate.

✦ ——— ✦

End of Compendium — Draft 2

Incorporates: Codex Threadica (Year 1003 A.F.) ✦ Author's Design Notes ✦ Narrative Intent Annotations

Subject to revision as the story develops.